Narrative therapy forms the practical and theoretical foundation for much of our work at DISPUK. It has been a source of inspiration and a basis for developing practices in therapy, as well as in fields such as education, leadership, and consultative work

Michael White, who, alongside David Epston, took the initial steps in developing narrative practice, passed away 15 years ago. While we can still draw inspiration from the work they did, it is also an opportune time to examine how narrative practice can continue to be in constant evolution – and in what directions we can move it.

In this work, Travis Heath is a significant inspiration because he employs a narrative approach with a focus on how we can rethink narrative practice in relation to the individuals we work with and the time we operate in. How can we modify our therapy to precisely the people and culture within which we work? The day with Travis is for everyone who appreciates narrative practice but is also interested in finding inspiration on how we can take it in new directions.

Travis Heath is an associate professor at the University of San Diego. His interests include looking at shifting from a multicultural approach to counselling to one of cultural democracy, that invites people to heal in mediums that are culturally near. He has written the book “Reimagining Narrative Therapy Through Practice Stories and Autoethnography” with Tom Stone Carlsen and David Epston. The book is sold at DISPUKs Webshop and made a Ted Talk about Self care to Communities of Care.
